Contents Summary	The course combines a comprehensive and critical introduction to the history and development of social work with inter- and transnational perspectives. Starting from historical origins in the pre-modern era and in the context of industrialisation, it traces the development of social work as a profession and discipline up to the present day, examining its meanings and entanglements in different contexts and periods. The course broadens the focus to inter- and transnational dynamics of social work, analysing power relations and global inequalities, and reflecting on decolonial approaches and transcultural challenges. Participants thus develop a nuanced understanding of social work perspectives and possibilities for action within the context of current glocal tensions and challenges.

Specific Educational Objectives and Learning Outcomes	1. Knowledge and Understanding: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Develop a critical understanding of the historical trajectories of social work, including its origins, milestones, and contested narratives. - Recognise how social work has been both complicit in and resistant to systems of oppression, including colonialism, patriarchy, racism, and classism. - Understand how histories of social work have been shaped, silenced, or whitewashed, and engage with efforts to decolonize and pluralize these histories. - Comprehend the challenges and possibilities of social work in inter-, transnational, and global contexts, particularly in relation to histories of inequality and movements for justice. - Analyze the impact of societal and social policy developments at local, national, European, and international levels, situating them within broader struggles for rights, justice, and recognition. 2. Application of Knowledge and Understanding: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Develop a historically, politically, and culturally reflexive professional stance, attentive to legacies of power, oppression, and resistance. - Apply historical and transnational perspectives to critically engage with contemporary dilemmas in social work, including issues of migration, global inequalities, and post-/decolonial transformations. - Connect critical historical insights with present-day practices to foster inclusive forms of social work across different contexts. 3. Judgment: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Critically assess the professionalisation of social work, acknowledging its entanglements with state power, colonial projects, and social control, as well as its emancipatory and resistant traditions. <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Analyze and evaluate how contemporary social and political developments—such as globalisation, populism, ecological crises, and struggles for decolonisation—affect the practice and ethics of social work. - Exercise reflexive judgment about the role of social workers in reproducing or challenging inequalities. 4. Communication: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Acquire and use specialised concepts, language, and terminology for engaging with the history and transnational dimensions of social work, with attention to critical, intersectional, and decolonial vocabularies. - Communicate complex historical and transnational issues clearly and sensitively in the teaching languages, with awareness of diverse audiences and cultural contexts. 5. Learning Strategies: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> - Develop strategies for independent and critical learning, research, and knowledge acquisition, especially in relation to marginalised, silenced, and decolonial histories of social work. - Strengthen the ability to engage with diverse sources and perspectives, also beyond mainstream or Eurocentric accounts. - Foster a commitment to lifelong learning and critical reflection on the ethical, political, and historical dimensions of social work in global and local settings.

Contents Summary	This module explores the development of social work from inter- and transnational perspectives. It examines internationalisation and transnationalisation, colonial and neocolonial legacies, and tensions between global definitions and local practices. Key themes include migration, human rights, inequalities, and cross-border collaboration. Students engage with perspectives from the Global South, indigenous knowledges, and decolonial theory to develop a critical and reflexive understanding of social work in diverse contexts.
Course Topics	This module examines the development of social work from an inter- and transnational perspective. It addresses processes of internationalisation, including the emergence of international organisations and professional networks, by addressing the tension between a global understanding and definition of social work and the risks of professional imperialism and epistemic injustices. Applying a transnational lens, the module also critically analyses how global interconnections, power relations, and historical legacies shape the profession and discipline of social work. Students explore the colonial and neocolonial roots of social work and engage with perspectives from the Global South, indigenous

	knowledges, and decolonial theory. Key themes include migration, human rights, global inequalities and challenges, and cross-border professional collaboration. Through readings, discussions, group work, and reflection, participants develop a critical and reflexive understanding of social work in its diverse cultural and political contexts, challenging dominant narratives and critically engaging with processes of inter- and transnationalisation as well as with borders and bordering practices.

Contents Summary	The course provides an overview of the history of social work from its pre-modern predecessors to the present day. Both the local and national context as well as a European (and international) perspective are taken into account. Special emphasis is placed on the socio-historical development of social work as a profession in the context of social and socio-political development. Against this background, the life and work of selected pioneers of social work are discussed and their significance for the establishment of traditional lines in the development of the profession and its methods is demonstrated.
